The BMJ: driving better research and practice since 1840

Ranked number 4 in General Medicine journals for average citations

The BMJ has championed the medical profession for nearly two centuries. But while we celebrate the work of doctors, we also challenge them to do still better as researchers and clinicians.

The exceptional quality of the original research we publish, just 4% of what authors submit, has earned The BMJ a place in the top general medical research journals globally. But, faculty and students, clinicians too, also value our education content. This is notable for:

- Broad appeal, both globally and in terms of specialty
- Originality
- Relevance and importance
- High ethical standards
- Ease of use

We find original content, different to that found in textbooks or elsewhere. We prioritise the most common topics or situations that have serious consequences. These have international appeal and interest a variety of doctors.
